While in college most have a fairly flexible schedule in which it isn't too difficult to find time to volunteer. As you get into your career and start a family, it can become difficult to prioritize giving your time back to your community. Here are a few ways you can give back with a hectic schedule and commitments.

Join an advisory committee—Many of those on an advisory committee are working adults and therefore have flexible meeting times. Although you aren't working at ground level you can make a difference in the structure and capacity of an organization.

Mentor student chapters—Being a mentor for a student group can be a small time commitment while still playing an important role in the lives of the students in that organization and those they may effect.

Virtually Freelance—You can volunteer to help an organization with a specific task you could do from home. An example would be setting up their website or social media. These can be the small details that the employees of the organization don't always have time for. Even the small details can make a big difference.

Company Volunteering—Many companies host volunteer projects or offer time off for volunteering. Check with your company to see about opportunities, or plan a service project for your coworkers!

Possible service activities include:
- Mulching trails
- Landscaping
- Cleaning and preparing the camp for summer
This Service project can accommodate 15 volunteers.
Open to S&T Students, Faculty, and Staff.
